They can spread to ground nesting birds and they can lead to "wildfire and debris burning." That's because these fires can cut off access to nesting sites, which can lead to the loss of local species and a decline in wildlife population. This isn't to say that camping or hiking in a park isn't allowed, but you should carefully consider what you're doing. It's kind of like cutting off all the side roads when you're cruising on a highway. Sure you still have to drive on the right side of the road (but that's different), but you can save a few precious minutes and the safety of others if you take a few minutes and find the best route. Smoking of any kind is prohibited. Campfires are the exception. They're allowed on wilderness camping sites (i.e. not in parking lots) and within designated camp areas. However, there are rules and if you don't read them, you could face harsh consequences. Campfires are supposed to be limited to 300 feet from any trail or road, except in designated camp areas. There are a couple of things you need to consider before lighting a fire. FIRST: check with your campsite to make sure there are no restrictions on the use of campfires. Next, SECOND: make sure the space is safe. Don't try to use a fire to make sparks. It's dangerous for you and it's dangerous for the environment. Ask about safe places to keep your fire. The fire can't be directly on soil or rock and must be at least three feet away from trees and tall grass. The flame can't be flickering. It should be burning steadily. Sparks from a safe fire go up in the air and dissipate as they rise. THIRD: add wood to your fire for safety. Preferably, you should have at least half of the wood covered with dried leaves or grass to keep the fire from sparks
