If you have any negative opinion on this software, you can leave your feelings below.Q: Store user query answers in RDBMS I'm going to ask a very theoretical question about RDBMS. So, if any one have a better answer please share in comment. I have a question which is: Assuming, that I have a TABLE = { questions, responses, votes } where questions - user-defined questions, responses - user answers to a questions (result of a vote), votes - number of users who voted for an answer. Let's say, that we have votes > 0, and there is no consistency about how they look like, i.e. there is no unique answer to a question. But, each user knows the answer (it's his property). So, is it possible to store this answers for future users (if someone wants to make some statistics or just browse users)? That question can be summarized as : is it possible to store some data about users answers (count of votes, IP address, time for response, etc.) in some kind of RDBMS? A: Yes, you can store the answers and other user-related data in database. The schema (fields) that you have defined above will be sufficient. For example, if you don't have a primary key for questions table, you can use questionid to indicate the question. You can define a relationship between a question and a user for storing the votes. You can also fetch all answers for a particular question. To store user-related data, you can write a stored procedure. Post navigation Trying to catch up It's that time of year again! Luckily I didn't start a blog for this particular Thursday before when an invitation for the Twoshoot Festival came in the mail.
