SQL Injection How To Spot It

Browser input is often passed through the web server as POST data. Parameterised SQL queries don't accept user input. They only accept parameters. However, if a web application takes external data (for example a user input or a cookie) and passes it through the web server, it's highly likely that this external data will be treated as a parameter and executed as SQL. Avoid parameters if you can and pass the data through the database directly, but remember that it may be impossible. What It Means It's normal for a web application to read external information. A web server can then pass this information (for example
