AutoCAD Serial Key uses block-based drafting techniques. The drawing canvas contains geometric shapes (blocks), which are composed in various ways to form shapes and surfaces. The entire drawing process is performed using commands that are written into "blocks" (text windows) in which the user types the commands. AutoCAD has three types of drawing (or model) files: DWG, DXF and SVG. A DWG drawing is a conventional sheet of paper containing vector, or geometric, objects, which can be manipulated by editing the drawing text. It can also be opened in other programs for post-production editing. The DXF file is a conventional paper drawing in which all objects are in raster form. The SVG file is an acronym for Scalable Vector Graphics, an XML-based vector file format. AutoCAD supports numerous types of drawing objects. These objects include: Objects can also be used to display content on a surface. For example, you can add a text box on the surface of a block (the method AutoCAD calls "graphics") or add a shadow (the method AutoCAD calls "hatching"). Other AutoCAD functions include: • The ability to create, edit and manipulate shape and surface objects • Dynamic updating of the drawing canvas as the model is manipulated • The ability to create compound geometric shapes called spline objects, or curves. Spline objects have predefined shapes called knots. They can be manipulated using curves tools to create an infinite number of shapes. • The ability to generate freehand or freeform drawing without being tied to the traditional axes. Types of objects AutoCAD supports two types of objects. The first is the solid, or geometric, object. The second is the surface, or graphical, object. A solid object may or may not have a surface. Objects Geometric objects are geometric shapes that you create in a drawing. You define a geometric object by defining its boundaries. An object's extent is the volume of space that the object can occupy. Shapes A shape is a geometric shape created by drawing boundaries. Examples of shapes are rectangles, circles, lines, and triangles. A shape is usually defined by four points of reference, which determine its boundaries.

I think it was in my very first class at university. I'd skipped a couple of classes so I was sitting in the front row, a bit shocked and intimidated that the professor would be addressing us. All eyes were on me, awaiting my reaction. The professor's introduction to his topic spooked me. At that time I'd never even heard of entrepreneurship. Of course, I had a fair amount of experience with the creative arts. It was the only non-business major I chose. I'd had a couple of part-time jobs but this was my first big toe into entrepreneurship. Of course, at the time I had no idea what entrepreneurship was. Entrepreneurship – the very concept was unknown to me. In my mind I imagined successful entrepreneurs being these rugged, cigar-smoking types; running off into the woods alone and staying there for the rest of their lives. I wanted nothing to do with that. I wanted to run off into the woods with the girls. I wanted to run off and be with people. I wanted to go to work in my cute office with the stunning view of the sea. I wanted to hang out with my friends. I wanted to be like everyone else. Clearly that's not the way it works. Successful entrepreneurship requires a hell of a lot of work. It requires you to start by creating a business model that works and that people will want to use. Then you need to create a brand. You need to build that brand and then you need to come up with sales strategy and marketing strategy. I was lucky enough to have an agent at the
