Bivalirudin (Angiomax) in patients undergoing percutaneous coronary intervention. Bivalirudin (Angiomax) is a new hirudin-based, antithrombotic agent with a rapid, predictable onset of action and a reversible, predictable anticoagulant effect that prevents fibrin formation. Its pharmacokinetic and pharmacodynamic profile make bivalirudin an attractive agent to use in percutaneous coronary interventions. It has been shown to be as effective as heparin and equivalent to fondaparinux in preventing periprocedural ischaemia, reducing angiographic thrombus formation, and decreasing early (30 days) and late (6 months) mortality. However, its anticoagulant effect is not persistent, and its efficacy in preventing and treating ischaemia is not definitive. Other limitations include its expense, lack of a convenient, intravenous formulation, and lack of data in patients with ST elevation myocardial infarction. To date, it has not been shown to be superior to heparin or fondaparinux for prevention of thrombotic events in clinical trials. The safety profile and the clinical outcomes associated with bivalirudin remain unclear. Finally, the risk of major bleeding and heparin induced thrombocytopenia appears to be low in patients receiving bivalirudin for percutaneous coronary interventions.
