How the NSA Is Watching You Online - danso ===== danso ...before anyone gets too outraged... I remember when ARPANet was in its infant stages, too. Back then, some geniuses that were developing the first systems described exactly how the system would work. That's how I learned to write software. One of the described features was the basic idea of the introspective data collection that the modern NSA is doing. ~~~ sktrdie If you think it's creepy when the government does it, wait until it's you them. Not sure how they can do it when it's you, since they're probably using the same network. ~~~ danso > _Not sure how they can do it when it's you, since they're probably using > the same network. _ Sure, that's not an insane idea. But I do wonder if in a few years from now, when we're all voluntarily sharing reams of sensitive personal data online, the government will request access to that data as a "law enforcement requirement." If so, the easiest way to do it, I would think, would be to hijack the network. No matter what layer you can peer into, the physical infrastructure is well-defined and still functioning. ~~~ gcr It'd be easier to create a worm that reinfects all their targets' devices. ~~~ danso Yea...that's why I'm hypothesizing that they're first on the network, than using it. It's easier to hijack their devices than the devices of the actual target. I'm just back in town from the Lake Como region of northern Italy and I've been researching whether the real-life Italian writer and film director Mario Monicelli actually is from such a small town as
