Not only is it a cheap Windows tablet but it's one of the best tablets Microsoft has made. At first, Motorola was planning to take the fight to Google to win over Android users but that plan seems to have been scrapped. Today, Microsoft came out to make their own tablet, and unlike the Nexus 7 it is really expensive and isn't cheap. It might not be any good either as they offer support for Windows 8, which will be the current operating system until Windows 9 is released next year. However, it seems to be moving ahead at a good pace, with the first images showing off the device a while back. That said, the latest reports is that Microsoft has adopted a 'different' strategy, one that Google didn't. It's a strategy that is going to slow it down a lot. A few months ago we were told that Microsoft's next tablet would be one that would cost less than the cost of the Nexus 7. That looked like the company was looking to fight fire with fire, and it would be a battle for all those Windows tablet users. However, it seems like now Microsoft is looking more to pander to Win 8 users, making them feel like they got a good deal. Many Win 8 users complain that it's a bit lacking compared to Win 7, it makes you wonder how much Microsoft is missing out on. That's the same with the Nexus 7, even though it's cheaper. While it might be cheaper, it's a bit lacking compared to Android. Heck,
