As Canada's economy moves into high gear after a lethargic past few years, New Democrats predict they are poised to ride a power surge into the 2019 federal election. But at the same time, a rising tide of anti-NDP sentiment has been bubbling under the surface as Ottawa struggles with low growth and the impact of the novel coronavirus. "There will be higher voter turnout in 2019," NDP Leader Jagmeet Singh said in an interview. "I think the negativity that's been built up over the last few years is going to change at the end of the day." It's a strategy he vows to repeat in the next election — something he warned of in 2015 and lost. Singh believes that although polls say it's too early to tell, the NDP will come out on top. "Whenever there's a crisis in the world, whenever there's a change, we always have a record of coming out of tough situations," he said. "I think for all the people that don't like the NDP, for all the people who don't like minorities, for all the people who didn't like Indigenous people, we haven't seen any kind of a rejection of the programs that we've put forward. We've seen that the people who voted NDP in 2015, for the most part, voted NDP in 2019." The NDP — and its federal cousins — have been polling at around 30 per cent approval ratings in the last two years, a good number in Canadian politics. Yet people are frustrated with the slow pace of change, the economy being battered by unpredictable factors, and the controversies over the handling of the novel coronavirus outbreak. Singh has also come under fire for his decision to appoint another Sikh as NDP vice-president of the House of Commons. The decision was condemned by several premiers and at least two MPs, who resigned in protest. In the SNC-Lavalin scandal, Parliament has been suspended for five weeks and the Conservatives have sworn to take full control of the House. PM still popular Singh is trying to transition the NDP from a protest movement into a government-in-waiting, and he has to begin to explain who he is, and why he's not the Jack Layton of 2019 — someone people would definitely want to be prime minister. The NDP leader says he 0cc13bf012
