Bernie Sanders' supporters are frustrated and a bit scared. Concerned that the campaign has become toxic and that she is under threat from other Democratic socialist competitors, Debbie Wasserman Schultz is reportedly leaning on the Clintons to concede. of a messy transition that brings a long-time Clinton loyalist into the Trump White House.

Officials close to Schultz are reportedly insisting that Clinton must relinquish control of the Democrats and cede to one of her top lieutenants. But the questions remain: Does

Clinton actually want to end this primary? How would Sanders supporters react if she ran and if Schultz or Tim Kaine became her running mate? The good news for the Clinton campaign is that polling does show that a Sanders-Wasserman Schultz ticket has positive appeal to many Democratic voters. According to a Wall Street Journal/NBC News poll released last week, if Sanders were the Democrats' nominee, he'd get 60 percent of the vote while Clinton would get only 34 percent. In a hypothetical matchup, Sanders would beat Trump by 12 points. Even if Sanders is the nominee, Clinton would beat Trump by eight points, so a seamless transition wouldn't necessarily be bad for Democrats. But it's not necessarily good, either. Clinton and her team have played up the idea that she would bring all the left-wing radicals into the fold while Sanders would only draw in the more mainstream liberals and trade unionists. To say the least, that doesn't compute. Sanders is the most left-wing candidate in a major party running for president. A serious challenge for Clinton —
