When the broad-winged hawk (Buteo platypterus) is skittish it is a good indication that other large predatory birds are about. For example, after a great horned owl (Bubo virginianus) has killed a large bird or small animal, it has often just been ambushed and will retreat to safety after taking one or two stupendous mouthfuls. So the blue jay (Cyanocitta cristata) hunting high in the dead tree is not for hunting. It is in the high perch to sit safely, figure out what to do next, and wait for something bad to happen to a big bird. With its occasional pause to watch from the tree, its slender shape, and pointed tail, the long-tailed hawk (Haliaeetus albicilla) may look more like a crow than a raptor, but the broad-winged hawk is a predator in a much bigger league than a crow. Since the broad-winged hawk inhabits a wooded landscape, it hunts by active listening for the sound of a distressed, smaller bird. And its hunting style is stoop-sitting or waiting stealthily for a victim to approach. Larger birds would freeze in place before the slow-stooping broad-winged hawk swooped down silently upon them. The broad-winged hawk is almost always hunting in pairs and their
