Endocrine pancreatic regulation is altered in chronic kidney disease (CKD) with no clear explanation for the appearance of diabetes mellitus in CKD patients. Particularly, it is unclear whether diabetes is actually due to β -cell dysfunction or rather to glucotoxicity originating from the high insulin levels in CKD patients. In order to clarify this issue, the present review will summarise the most important parts of the most recent studies with special emphasis on beta-cell biology and cell signalling. Insulin release and beta-cell function are modified by changes in cell death and proliferation. The importance of glucose as an energy substrate for pancreatic cells has recently been investigated in great details. The relationship between insulin and its expression, processing and secretion are still not completely understood. Recently, it has been shown that glucose lowering improves beta-cell function. Despite some limitations, the present review confirms the importance of insulin in CKD and its difficulties
