Parental support for healthy eating-mothers' experiences of being an active role model to their children. This study examined what parents feel can be offered to help their child eat healthy and prepared foods and explore how this differs according to their age and gender. The study also examines what kind of support mothers feel they can offer to their child when eating. The study involved convenience sampling with a UK student population attending three high schools in England. A total of 609 mothers completed an online survey. Multivariable logistic regression and a qualitative approach were employed to analyse the data. The results indicated that parents were generally aware of the benefits of healthy eating. However, there were significant age and gender differences in the support given to children by their parents. Mothers were generally more aware of eating healthily themselves, found it easier to support
