I work with a small global charity that invests millions of dollars every year in innovative projects in Africa and Asia. So it's absolutely no surprise that I'm a huge fan of energy and sustainability — going a step further than just talking about it and actually trying to make it happen. Four years ago, my organization added energy and sustainability to our mission. I was working for a good company, but I knew that to make a real difference in global development we needed to be a bit more proactive. Not doing enough to build the support of our target populations for more than one year into the future wasn't a recipe for sustainable social programs. I wrote an organization-wide memo about energy and sustainability. I was clear that the company could not allow these activities to be low-priority. The company's financials showed that missing a scheduled direct payment for a month or more could cost $100 million or more. It would be a huge pain for the company, so we needed to provide a clear path for the company to make up these payments at a sustainable rate. The memo also outlined exactly what activities we should be undertaking and created a mechanism to pay for them. When I had finished, I was fairly sure that the company would be able to cover the costs. I was wrong. The company's response? "Great memo. Now why don't we just cancel the program?" They didn't 6d1f23a050
