The U.S. consumer-confidence index sank more than expected to a 17-year low in October and is showing little sign of stabilizing, with shoppers feeling more pessimistic than optimistic about the economic outlook and how much their paychecks are going to rise. A general view of the Bloomingdale's flagship store located in the Manhattan borough of New York City, New York, U.S. October 26, 2017. REUTERS/Mike Segar The Conference Board said on Thursday its measure of consumer confidence dropped to a reading of 95.3, the lowest since December 2001, from 97.3 in September. Economists polled by Reuters had forecast a reading of 98.0. The index of expectations for the future slipped in October to the lowest since March 2001. At the same time, the so-called "present situation" gauge of consumer confidence, which shows how households view their current financial situations, declined to 1.3 from 1.7. The sharp drop in confidence on a single month basis was partly driven by survey respondents saying their paychecks were staying the same or shrinking. “We have a lot of headwinds for the economy, including higher taxes, more regulation, etc. and those kind of things aren’t going away,” said Scott Hoyt, a senior director at Moody’s Analytics in West Chester, Pennsylvania. “It’s really a case of ‘don’t expect much’ for the rest of the year.” With the government shutdown stretching into its 34th day, a pullback in business spending in the first three months of the year and a sell-off in global markets, economists expect growth to slow to a pace of 2.0 percent this quarter. A separate index of consumer sentiment, which has recovered from a six
