Investigation of the chemical stability of monoclonal antibodies in different conditions of formulation. The influence of physical and chemical stress parameters on the stability of seven different monoclonal antibodies (B3D10, B72.3, 2G12, OC-4A, M24, REA 11 and EK1) was investigated. The stability was determined by a set of different analytical assays: total and free protein concentration, sedimentation velocity, aggregation, oxidation and fragmentation. In the samples studied, no degradation products were detected in any assay. When evaluating the degradation of the monoclonal antibodies by the different assays, it was observed that aggregates do not affect the measured values. In the assays that measure fragmentation (SDS-PAGE, HPLC-SEC), the results indicate a protective effect of the aggregates during fragmentation. The free protein concentration is not a good indicator of the tendency of the antibody to degrade. Free protein concentration decreases rapidly immediately after addition of the aggregates and the decrease is not a function of the aggregation state of the aggregates. Physical stress parameters, such as temperature or pH changes, have also been studied. A reduction in monoclonal antibody stability
