Is there any difference between these two methods regarding the time that is computed, or is it just a matter of preference? A: The +[NSDate dateFromString:] method is a class method. This means that it is called by the class itself, so the object that is created is an instance of the class. This is faster than creating a normal class method because the instance doesn't need to create an extra copy of itself. The +[NSDate dateFromString:] method is in fact overloaded, providing two different versions depending on the number of arguments you give it. The first form, which is the one you're using, takes one string and creates a new date from it. If there is an error, this method will return nil. The second form, which is provided by the class, takes two strings (the date and the time) and creates a date from those. So, for example, if you had: NSDate *date1 = [NSDate dateFromString:@"1/1/2010 12:00:00"]; then the first method would return nil because the string it was given doesn't have any time information. But the second one will correctly create a date object from the provided information. A: dateFromString is a class method. So you need to create an instance of NSString with a date from string. Its performance is equal to copy of dateFromString. Isolation and identification of four presynaptic inhibitory neuropeptides from the endocrine cell clusters of the pituitary stalk of the mouse. Four neuropeptides, neurophysin II, gammalipotropin, oxytocin and gonadotropin-releasing hormone-releasing peptide, were isolated and characterized from the endocrine cell clusters of the pituitary stalk of the mouse by means
