welcome to your favorite social networking web site with open source script. for at least the past few years, a number of "tribal" groupings have emerged that largely will not allow anyone who is an insider--that is to say, anyone with a degree of social or financial capital, a work education, or any other "tribal" characteristic--to enter its ranks, including the ivy league, the western academia, and, most often, the legal fraternity. this "tribalism" is allowed to run rampant because no one seems to notice it. indeed, if you were to venture into, for example, any law firm's dining room where non-insiders are excluded, you would hardly ever notice if you were one. is this tribalism malign? of course it is, but only a phd economist would bother questioning it, because no one who doesn't have a phd in economics questions such blind tribalism. after all, once you accept that people are always operating in a "tribal" manner, it's easy to conclude that, sure, people will always act in a "tribal" manner and, in fact, that's why they are who they are, and you are what you are. in other words, you can't be a socialist, but you can help others understand socialism. and you can't be an immigration restrictionist, but you can help others understand the social and economic effects of massive immigration. you can't be catholic, but you can help others understand catholicism--as if the two were somehow connected, when they are, in fact, quite opposite. in the case of the ivy league, it is true that sports--football and basketball--are extremely important to these campuses, but that is only one of many aspects of a college experience. after all, academics is perhaps the most important aspect of a college experience, and yet that is totally missing from the ivy league. to be sure, there are probably some students on ivy league campuses who, perhaps, enjoy the exclusivity of being the only "insider." but that would be an anomaly, hardly worth arguing. and in any case, each ivy league school is, after all, well known for its undergraduate academic output. and, in any case, there is also the harsh reality that, in contrast to the ivy league schools, which are, at the best, only the equivalent of a high school education (or less), the "free-ride" aspect of the college education is missing from the western academia and the legal fraternity. and this is a severe problem, because the ivy league's "social" type of education--no doubt a long list of "tribal" cues as to who is insider and who is not--has been so successful that, now, it threatens to become more dominant than the purely academic aspect of the ivy league schools. moreover, perhaps because of its sports addiction, the western academia and the legal fraternity are particularly susceptible to tribalism. indeed, as noted, they, more so than the ivy league, are guilty of operating by a "tribal" worldview that regards the typical american as some sort of primitive savage. yet this sounds bizarre: what, other than "primitive savagery," can there be to support such a tribal perspective? as for the supreme court and the ftc, it is worth noting that, no doubt, a few people who have attended ivy league schools seek out such positions. but, again, is this a problem worth pursuing? these two examples speak for themselves: a cultural or political perspective is present in almost every society and almost every group of human beings.
