Altered processes related to planning, response generation and response selection were associated with increases in false alarm rates, indicating that an increase in the likelihood of making an error, even if error trials are rare, can in some cases be linked to greater inefficiency in attentional tasks (Attentional Network Score). It would be interesting in the future to examine whether or not such a link could be extended to disruptions of oscillatory rhythms, as our findings suggest that frontal-parietal beta waves are sensitive to not only the allocation of attention but also the efficiency with which it is directed. Conclusion {#s7} ===== In conclusion, the results from our study provide some support for the hypothesis that EEG studies should not necessarily be carried out in exclusively visual tasks as some pre-occupation with the visual modality could bias results. The current study is the first to provide evidence for the combined effects of attention and the visual modality on frontal-parietal beta oscillatory rhythms in a complex cognitive task, and provides a basis for further studies to test whether other aspects of working memory or learning are similarly affected by changes to attentional allocation. Data Availability {#s8} ===== All datasets generated for this study are included in the manuscript and/or the supplementary files.
