The new interface has a fresh look and a lot of improvements. The Compatibility View feature should prove useful in most cases. That feature has a very neat section on it called Photos. The Photos page displays thumbnails of the pictures that you take and whatever you did with in the past; you can save them back or not. You can also see the time when you took the pictures. If you are a careless shutterbug, this can be quite useful for keeping track of the previous times you took your camera out. The last thing is that I don't like the way the pictures display on the page. Since it's a web-based application, I'd think that it would work best on devices with a fuller screen. The iPhone/iPad is not that, and so I don't find the web version of the application as compelling. What makes it clean and easy to use Photoshop is to start at the appropriate place and trundle away towards the desired result. From here on you just can enjoy your job which is translating your images into gorgeous photographs. The Edges tool makes using existing tools much simpler. If you use any of the layers, you have more options, making the job much easier. The Learning Center is a bit like a tinted Figure 8, making the learning more pleasurable and easy to digest. The intent is to make it easier for newbies to quickly get the hang of the application. To this end, the program is sorted according to what you need most. The only complaint is that the interface is not really user-friendly. I have also tried this library, and it is really useful. But I am a little bit puzzled by the instruction, that you should work in the non zero mode and use the second monitor for your workflow. As I have no second monitor, I am using my notebook screen for the tutorials and like to work with the second monitor and use the notebook for taking notes etc. Which is my workflow. So basically I am wondering what the point of these "zero" modes are? Does anybody know? Thanks.
