Desktop users, too, can access files stored on the web. The location or drive where the files are stored will be highlighted in the left navigator. Each cloud-based file will have a passport stamped beside the photo or artwork in the right navigator. Histograms will appear on both image files, the composite browser and the slideshow overlays, so that you can easily identify any potential issue, such as high- or low-light (or poor shadow detail), which the file may benefit from in Lightroom. As we've mentioned, Lightroom 5 has some very useful new features that are great for professionals. I'm going to take a look at the new image-editing features in more detail but I'll start with a look at the new user interface. The primary accessibility options have been moved to one new panel, right below the main image display. Using the "brightness controls" makes it easy to adjust the overall image brightness without affecting shadows or whites. The "Lens Correction" control is only available when pressing the "lens icon" and is perfect for correcting lens flaws. This is a must for anyone who owns or uses multiple lenses. The new HDR tools are excellent. Adobe knows the importance of Image Stabilization, and the new Photomatix certainly adds precision for those who may not have even thought of trying the technique before. HDR details are almost uniformly excellent, with new presets, too. I've already mentioned the new image handling tools, but they're not the primary focus for me. The biggest new feature is the inclusion of the new "reflow" feature. Early on, I really wanted to rate this feature higher, since it was one of the prime reasons I migrated to Lightroom. But as we know, Lightroom does not do reflow whatsoever. After all, the tool is for "reflow". That's the moniker this tool is branded with. That was a major problem and a missed opportunity. But I suppose that Photoshop does it so well, so why mess with a simple utility that works? In any case, the tool is definitely useful, but I'm not sure it's worth having it on the Loseless channel. Perhaps a custom setting in Photoshop would have been better. Still, it's a huge improvement. Compare it to the old "reflow" in Adobe Graphics CS4 – that wasn't very hot. Occasionally, a feature would get added and it would work well, but then they would start to put it in the actual application and the utility would fall by the wayside.

Now, we have complete control over the color space used when opening a file with custom mode set to preference or output color space. For instance, we can choose to use ProPhoto RGB when opening a file in the basic color mode of CMYK, making sure the file will look right when printed.
