Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a roll coating machine, and more particularly to a roll coating machine in which the cover member of a roll is placed on the end of a roll and the roll is rotated together with the cover member to apply paint onto the surface of the paper or the like wound on the roll. 2. Description of the Prior Art In general, a roll coating machine is used to apply paint onto the surface of paper or the like wound on a roll, as well as to coat both surfaces of a piece of paper or the like. According to an example of the prior art roll coating machine of this kind, a roll is wound up in a circumferential direction. A cover member is then fitted to an end of the roll at a position in line with its circumference. Both ends of the cover member are mounted rotatably on two substantially horizontal shafts, respectively. An axle shaft is disposed between the two shafts, to which the shafts are fixed to each other. The roll is placed on the upper end of the axle shaft in a clamped state. On the other hand, an open space is defined at the lower end of the axle shaft between the two shafts. The cover member is moved up and down to move the roll upwards and downwards, in synchronism with a rotation of the roll. As a result, paint applied onto the upper surface of the roll is transferred onto the paper when it passes the cover member and is wound around the roll. The cover member is continuously rotated in the same direction as the roll at a speed higher than that of the roll to enable a uniform coating to be achieved on the surface of the paper. For the above-mentioned roll coating machine, it is advantageous for the roll to have a certain thickness, because when the thickness is too small, the paper becomes thinner. It is possible to make the coating of the paper more uniform if the roll is rotatably supported by bearings. The roll must also have a certain length to allow a rotation of the cover member in a circumf
