What I like about Photoshop is that photo editors seem to have the tools to handle any type of image editing, whether it's a magazine photo, a company logo or any other type of object. Any photo editor can make adjustments to a normal photo, but it's generally a better idea to work on a separate layer and make adjustments that you can easily undo. After all, you envision your editorial content in the raw image, not in the development of the image (or using an undigitized photo in the program). As far as I can tell, though, Photoshop Elements is not designed to take you from a standard photo editor to a photo retoucher. Similarly, it does not set out to replace a developer.) In that regard, you really need Photoshop's built-in answers to get more out of your images. In that regard, many Photoshop Elements users will have that capacity, if indeed they choose to repeat many of the tasks that they can do in Elements.
